Information Technology, MS

The College of Management was recently ranked #47 for Information Management by QS TopMBA, highlighting the quality of our MSIT program and related specializations in the MBA.

Advancements in IT have revolutionized nearly every facet of human existence. Individuals and organizations communicate, connect, collaborate, and compete through increasingly sophisticated computer networks, systems, and devices. In a rapidly globalizing economy, the knowledge of how to effectively deploy IT assets to manage customer relationships, data collection and analysis, supply chains, work flows, or security concerns can make the difference between success and failure for individual managers and entire corporations. Coursework and student resources help students develop the communication, presentation, and analytical skills, as well as the technical, quantitative, and decision-making abilities required of contemporary managers.

The coursework for the MSIT is grouped around three key clusters:
- Technical Foundation of Information Technology
- Applications of Information Technology
- Information Technology Management and Strategy

International Management, MS

Students in the MSIM program take a set of core courses and then choose from a variety of elective courses to customize their experiences. These electives are from different fields in the College of Management (finance, management and marketing) and, potentially, from other colleges (economics, political science, international relations, and public policy). Each year, the College of Management runs trips abroad to business hubs such as India and China, allowing students to earn course credit while gaining valuable international management experience. The richness and diversity of the program enable students to tailor their elective coursework to their own interests. The comprehensive foundation in team management and strategy provides students with the skills in demand by their prospective employers upon graduation.

Given the overarching management perspective of the program, students from both business and non-business backgrounds will find it a valuable degree for career advancement. A balance between quantitative and qualitative courses provides students with a substantial understanding of how to manage international business.

College of Science and Mathematics

Computer Science, MS

The MS program is intended as a preparation for professional careers in software development, although it will also provide the background for further graduate work leading to the PhD degree. The program stresses the integration of theoretical knowledge with practical applications.

Applied Physics, MS

The nationally ranked Applied Physics Program is intended primarily to prepare students for rewarding technological careers in industrial and government research laboratories, although it also provides strong preparation for subsequent training at the doctoral level.

Following the initial year of coursework, qualified students may opt for an internship placement in an industrial research laboratory in Boston area. These positions provide further training and useful job experience in preparation for a technological career. Alternatively, students may undertake a thesis involving a project in one of the established research groups in the department.
Pre-Master’s Program (continued)

McCormack Graduate School of Policy and Global Studies

Conflict Resolution, MA
The Master of Arts (MA) in Conflict Resolution offers a comprehensive curriculum encompassing conflict resolution skills, practice, analysis, theory, and research. Students have the opportunity to explore conflict in a context of particular interest to them. Areas of concentration offered by the department include organizational and international conflict. These concentrations, as well as other topics of student interest, can be pursued through foundation and elective courses within the department, elective courses in other areas of the university, field placements in organizations, and design of final projects.

International Relations, MSPA
The MSPA in International Relations prepares students to face a wide range of global policy problems through a flexible, interdisciplinary program. Our program specializes in helping students bring academic rigor and theoretical insight to pressing policy challenges. A degree in international relations equips our students with:
- A solid theoretical foundation for understanding the actors, systems, and patterns that comprise our increasingly dynamic international system.
- Systematic insight into pressing issues in current international politics.
- Advanced academic skills in research methods and study design.

Our program is also uniquely situated in a department of Conflict Resolution, Human Security, and Global Governance, within a school of public policy. This gives our students a wholly unique perspective with which to approach the study of international politics. Some areas of strength within the program include:
- The study of international organizations.
- International environmental politics.
- Conflict Resolution and Negotiation.
- International Development and the Politics of the Global South.

The program is oriented towards equipping individuals with the skills needed to work in an international organization, internationally oriented national or local government agencies, an international non-profit or non-governmental organization, international business, or to continue an academic career.
